

Sayyid Ammar al-Hakim: the advantage of the current crisis is that it is a political crisis without sectarian orientation

Sayyid Ammar al-Hakim the chairman of the Islamic Supreme Council of Iraq believed that the current political crisis in spite of being stifling, but it in one of its contents was pure politically without religious grouping, at which all sides had parliament representatives and political blocs from all the Iraqi people denominations, noting that the nature of the crisis had motivated to ask for an unbiased bloc, stressing the need to follow the legal procedures in objecting and expressing opinions.

\r\n

This was addressed during a speech in his eminence Baghdad office at the Baghdad Dewan of Iraqi tribes and leaders of Iraqi tribes Saturday, 07.05.2016.

\r\n

Eminence clarified that Iraq live in a state of war with ISIS with the addition to the economic crisis, therefore there must be a concerted effort for the advancement of Iraq, stressing that the reformations are a religious and national demand, demanded by all the patriots and good people, warning from making reforms a title exploited by the corrupt to hide underneath it, pointing to the disorder and chaos that marred the reforms and deceived the people , noting that the political action and the legitimacy of the blocs is a result of the people's elections, calling for respecting the will of the people and to distinguish between partnership and quotas, indicating that the minister vacancies are a political position and nominations for lower levels must be, adding that a huge amount of corruption lies in the middle rings, calling for an end to proxy employment in the state's critical positions and to have fresh employees in the Iraqi state.