

Our laws and the green trade

By: Haider Habib

When the states and governments legislate certain laws there must be some reason behind it based on clear understanding of what it's do, therefore to proceed a law or implement a decision, this is one of the serious matters that has great sensitivity because any law could cause tough effects and inevitable results, but the severity and importance increase, when these rules comes to important matters such as economics or example, the today's' lifeline for the countries and communities.

At the beginning of this year, there were talks about the Tariff Act, which was expected to be implemented in March; the law covered all imported goods in order to support the local product. But the government postponed it until further notice because it discovers a serious consequences to be happen to the citizens as the rising prices result which is already been raised by some merchants even before applying the Traffic Act, the government itself was embarrassed because of the demonstrations and anger in the streets at that time.

Some experts felt that the Traffic Act law can benefit the Iraqi citizen, if it applied gradually on some goods accompanied by the institutions, corporations and the private sector support in the country, otherwise the law harm will be greater than its use.

However, the government agencies did not comment on this opinion of experts, we did not hear the government explaining about the subject except for that it will be apply later. Today there are talks about an intention to erase the zeros of the Iraqi dinar, to support the value of the
